PROVO — The quality of teachers is the most important factor in quality instruction, says Dr. John W. Bennion, named earlier this year as one of the top 100 school superintendents in America.

Bennion, superintendent of the Provo School District, said the goal of the administration under the new career ladder program in Provo will be to help teachers become all they are capable of becoming.

"In addition, the career ladder program will attract first-rate minds into the profession."

Bennion's recent honor came through selection by the Executive Educator, a publication for school administrators.

"The superintendent ought to be a leader, not just a manager or a maintainer," he said.

Bennion, now in his third superintendency, said his major interest is the improvement of instruction.

Education is not only directly related to individual fulfillment, but also to the success of the democratic society we live in," he said.

Bennion, a Utah native and the son of a school superintendent, said the salary of teachers unfortunately has not reflected their true value. "Even over the 12-month period, it isn't what other occupations are making."

"Young people are the most cherished assets we have and we owe them the best preparation for a productive and fruitful life that can be provided," he said.

Bennion said one of the problems for education has been that educators try to take on too many goals.

"Schools have been asked to solve the problem of racial discrimination in our country, safe driving on the highway, the problems related to drugs, alcohol and sex abuses.

"All of these are very important, but no one institution can fulfill all of them," he said.

"Educators are trying to help students develop intellectually and that should be the primary goal."

Bennion said educators need to be sympathetic and do what they can to solve social problems, but they must distinguish their primary mission, which is to impart knowledge and develop students' knowledge.

Bennion, who is the father of six boys ranging in age from 19 years to 4 months, said he and his wife, Sylvia, try to be good role models by being ongoing learners. His wife attended seven different institutions of higher education while Bennion was accepting educational posts throughout the country and just last year earned her bachelor's degree at Brigham Young University.

"All adults should continue learning for the sake of their own development and to provide good examples for their children," he said.

Bennion's pet project is the career ladder concept for teachers, which allows them in most cases to make teaching a year-round project rather than the traditional nine-month job.

"We will be extending all of the teachers' contracts in the Provo District to give them additional time to sharpen their teaching, improve the curriculum and prepare their courses of study."

The second notion is to provide teachers with leadership opportunities based on their teaching excellence and professional leadership skills, to advance them both in responsibility and compensation over the career cycle.

The recent approval by Provo voters of a voted leeway referendum gives the Provo District the opportunity to place Bennion's pet project into operation. He already has held numerous meetings and hopes to have the innovative plan in operation in 1985.
